If friendly warnings can turn the course of a nation from dangerous paths or the utterances of prophets of evil can frighten a people into retracing steps taken in a wrong direction, the United States should advance on safe ground. The pitfalls exposed may be avoided. A long lease of security and prosperity may thus be given to the nation which follows the comparatively untrodden path of republicanism. The words of those like Macaulay who have pointed out the national evils to come, are not less valuable than the encouragement of praise from a Gladstone. In the last issue of the International Review the pending ordeals of democracy are discussed in a thoughtful article by George W. Julian. It is not necessary in order to profit by this article that one shall assent completely to all the views of the author if it be considered that in some respects they are colored by his political tendencies. Every one will agree that the evils suggested are to a greater or less degree to be feared, though he may be unwilling to accept the examples presented by the author. Mr. Julian gives warning of the dangers that spring from false relations between the people and the land as illustrated by the growth of great estates and the resulting inequality of the people; from the domination of great cities and its antagonism to popular institutions and the prosperity of the rural districts; from the dangerous power of great corporations over the national and state governments; from the concentration of capital; from the centralization of political power, and from the shocking decay of political morality, partly the cause and partly the effect of the other evils mentioned. The danger from country in which the land is the patrimony of a few, cannot be truly free. The yeomanry, the strength of a republic, disappear and a landed aristocracy arises. The necessities of the infant republic and unwise laws in its later years, have given the nation a tendency in this direction that must be overcome. Great estates tend to swallow up the smaller ones and to produce a constantly multiplying and crouching bers of men who own hundreds of thousands of acres each, a proposition has been introduced into the state constitutional convention, with a estates. It is proposed that whenever one person owns more than one thousand acres of land, 50 per cent, shall be added to the valuation of his land for taxes; an additional 25 per cent, is to be added when two thousand acres are owned, and another similar addition is made when the ownership extends to three thousand acres. To the owner of 5,000 acre :, the increased valuation is 150 per cent., and it becomes 200 per cent, for the ownership of 8,000 acres. The effect of this system of progressive taxation remains to be seen. There is no point better established than the concentration of population in cities, which Mr. Julian suggests as the second evil. Successive statistics show that there is a continuous growth of cities at the expense of the country. The draft upon the farming population and the growing a cendency of the bad elements which rule the large towns, may well be dreaded. The great cities are not governed by democratic method-. and yet by holding the balance of power im important states they rule the nation. The agriculturists, whose interests suffer most, make up a majority of the people; their business feeds the human family, and from it both manufactures and commerce draw their life. Consciquently the whole of society is injured with them. The danger to the nation which may spring from the power of great corporations such as railroad companies, which represent a coasolidated capital of five thousand million dollars, and employ an army of 200,000 men, is also one to be regarded. The railroad has done much in settling and developing the western lands; creating towns which it connects, and extending civilization with all its appliances. It is a useful servant, but it will not be safe to permit it to become the master. Every one, too, will see the wisdom of guarding against the insidious approach of imperialism, and of endeavoring to purge the nation from political cor-

The tendency of the world in respect to inland navigation seems to be towards contraction rather than expansion of operations. The additions that have recently been made in this direction in France do not compensate for the of the world. It is likely that the grand canal of China, with a waterway 600 miles in length. on which 10,000 flatboats transport grain, will be abandoned as a commercial highway. This year grain has been forwarded from Nanking by sea for the first time. The objection to the canal is that junks are frequently delayed while channels are dug for their passage. This style of navigation has exhausted even Chinese ruption, with its strong allies in popular ignorance, in the vice of intemperance, which lends itself to the service of every evil element in society, and in the stupid enforcement of party discipline, after party issues have lost their meaning, or have totally disappeared.

Dean Stanley has now gratified one of his desires by seeing an American election. He has no doubt marked the confidence with which the leaders of both sides claim the victory, and is curious to see how the defeated prophets will explain matters after election. But without some lessons in repeating, ballot-box-stuffing, bull-dozing and other election arts, his experience will be incomplete.

Famine, war and pestilence have visited the world to an unusual degree in the year 1sis. In Asia millions have been swept away by the three evils. In Africa small-pox and cholera are now depopulating Morocco. The yellow fever in this country though insignificant in comparison has brought suffering and death to us. Twelve thousand persons have lost their lives, three times that number have suffered with the disease, and to an untold number loss of property and actual want will result from the effects of the pestilence.
